

Flint had read every adventure book she could get her paws on before The Long Walk.

She could tell you about almost every plant and creature in the forest and she loved sharing her knowledge even more than she loved using it.

So when they reached the river, Flint announced confidently that she knew all about the rocks beneath the water.

She pointed with her paw and told Raven and Idaho that they should only step on the big grey boulders -

“they’re the strongest,” she said, “and the safest to cross on.”

I know lots of cool stuff.

If my yeti adventure book says we should choose grey rocks, then that’s what we should do.